Millions of aerial photographs were taken by Allied pilots, flying unarmed modified Spitfires and Mosquitos on missions over Nazi Europe. It was said that an aircraft could land, the photographs be developed and initial interpretation completed within two hours - marking the culmination of years of experiments in aerial intelligence techniques. Their finest hour began in 1943, during the planning stages of the Allied invasion of Europe, when Douglas Kendall, who masterminded the interpretation work at Medmenham, led the hunt for Hitler’s secret weapons. The course of the war. Operation Crossbow is a wonderful story of human endeavour and derring-do, told for the first time. Try the new Google Books. Paperback. The story of the photographic intelligence work undertaken from a country house at Medmenham, Buckinghamshire, is one of the great lost stories of the Second World War. At its peak in 1944, almost 2,000 British and American men and women worked at the top-secret Danesfield House, interpreting photographs - the majority stereoscopic so they could be viewed in 3D - to unlock secrets of German military activity and weapons development. Much of the info in Operation Crossbow is published in an earlier book by Christy Campbell published in 2012. This book was published in 2013. The publishers claim on the cover that the book is “The Untold Story Of The Search For Hitler’s Secret Weapons” is untrue. However the author fills in gaps by Campbell. Allan Williams went so far as to provide photos that link names to faces. Operation Crossbow would grow from a handful of photographic interpreters to the creation of a hand-picked team, and came to involve interpreters from across the Medmenham spectrum, including the team of aircraft specialists led by the redoubtable Constance Babington Smith. In November that year, whilst analysing photographs of Peenemunde in northern Germany, they spotted a small stunted aircraft on a ramp. This intelligence breakthrough linked the Nazi research station with a growing network of sites in northern France, where ramps were being constructed aligned only with London, but targets th...Â Operation Crossbow is a wonderful story of human endeavour and derring-do, told for the first time.
